Ongoing Asia: A Challenge to Communications

Looking at Asia as a social and cultural entity has been fascinating for scholars, academics, professionals, and other social workers in many decades. In recent years there is a significant alteration in terms of understanding Asia not only as object of studies, but more importantly as an entry point towards new perspective and, probably, even new epistemology.

This tendency has also happened in concurrent with the rise of communication technology and medium, especially in the last decade. The so-called new communication era is also another important indicative of the ongoing yet challenging development in current Asian society. Exploring the intertwined ideas on any aspects of new communication era in Asian contexts would be beneficial to understand the dynamic of Asia now.

Following the successful inaugural Conference on Communication, Culture, and Media Studies (CCCMS) in 2014 and the second one in 2015, this year we invite academics and others interested in discussing Asia especially in relation to the context of new communication era.

The 3rd CCCMS 2016 aims to create an open forum for scholars, postgraduate students, communication and media professionals, and any other relevant parties to disseminate and share their ideas, research, and/or experiences. We welcome both individual and panel abstract from various disciplines or even interdisciplinary works, ranging from communications, strategic communication, creative arts and media, history and memory studies, anthropology, sociology, international relations and political science, cognitive and social psychology, cultural studies, and many more.
