

The Rise of Family Violence and Parenting Stress during the Covid-19 Pandemic: Family Science Proposed Solutions and Direction

¹Mohammad Anggito Abimanyu,²Muhammad Zudi Hardiansyah,³Khalisa Hasanah Labay

¹*Department of English Literature, Padjadjaran University, Bandung, Indonesia*

²*Department of French Literature, Padjadjaran University, Bandung, Indonesia*

³*Department of Accounting, Padjadjaran University, Bandung, Indonesia*

ABSTRACT

The rise of family-oriented misconduct is rising during the pandemic situation due to multiple problems related to economy, social and even many other physical embodiments in the element of living. In the theory of living substances, internal parental, external resources and parental perceptions towards all of the stressors element will impact how families cooperate with all of these burdens that they face, which may impact the possibility of child abuse, physical and mentally. This paper will uncover all of the available stressors that happen as a consequence of COVID-19 pandemic using the family stress theory at the family and society level, and then further elaborates how these elements are associated with family violence via parents perceptions and coping strategies. This research will also elaborate with the possible future obstacles that families may face during the implementation of new protocols, strict market revenue, and many other possible social barriers and obstacles ahead within the possible future change and development of society conditions.

Keywords: Covid-19, family stress theory, child abuse risk, perception